Dr. Marc Meyer published a research article in the journal Nature, "Reevaluating bipedalism in Danuvius. Dr. Meyer and his colleagues examined the functional anatomy of Danuvius guggenmosi, a species of Miocene hominoid from the 11.62-million-year-old site of Hammerschmiede. Unlike previous analyses, they found that this species was not a biped, and instead, its limb proportions, phalangeal curvature, and vertebral morphology suggest that Danuvius was adapted to upright posture and suspensory locomotion like living apes. This research was a collaboration with scholars from The University of Texas at Austin, New York University, Texas A&M University, Chaffey College and Stony Brook University.
